Descartes and Spinoza Two Approaches to Embodiment Alison Peterman 1. Introduction Descartes1 (1596–1650) and Spinoza (1632–1677) each gave us interest-ing and in=ential approaches to answering what I'll call "embodiment question": what is the relationship between a mind and its body—the

Descartes and Spinoza

According to Descartes' famous dualist theory, human beings were composed of physical bodies and immaterial minds. Spinoza disagreed. In "The Ethics," his masterwork, published after his death in 1677, he argued that body and mind are not two separate entities but one continuous substance. As for Descartes' view of the mind as a reasoning machine, Spinoza thought that was dead wrong.

Descartes versus Spinoza: Mind and Body

From Descartes to Spinoza Dr William Large. For Spinoza there is only one substance and this is substance is God. God, too, is central to Descartes' philosophy, for without the proof of the existence of God his whole metaphysics would collapse. But to some extent he still has a theological conception of God. God is understood as separate and transcendent in relation to the world such that Descartes splits substance between the infinite and finite, where finite substance itself is split ...

From Descartes to Spinoza

Spinoza, in the beginning of the third book of Ethics, denies Descartes assertion that error is caused by a free will making hasty judgments upon ideas, that is, not demanding clearness and distinctness, because error could only be due to the confused, unclear ideas themselves.

Descartes, the Christian outcast, Spinoza, the Jewish outcast, and Leibniz, the creative mathematician all acknowledge that what we know better than anything is the mind. Given this, we can deduce that any knowledge we acquire of our perceived bodies does not necessarily relate to some external reality, physical substance, or biological bodies.

Spinoza vs Descartes on God Essay - 3697 Words

The concept of God is central to the development of Cartesian and Spinozan philosophy. Although both philosophers employ an ontological argument for the existence and necessity of God the specific nature of God differs greatly with each account. While Descartes suggests a Judeo-Christian concept of God, Spinoza argues a more monistic deity similar to that of the Hindu tradition.
