Basically it is three different monologues, with the only things tying them together the tragedy of the tales, and the fact that they take place in a funeral home (hence the name "Three Viewings"). They are so perfectly written, so tragic and yet humorous that you don't know whether to laugh or cry yet somehow end up doing both.

Three Viewings speaks truths for anyone who has, in the wake of loss, uttered the inner monologue of wild confession that can follow. Common wisdom says that funerals are for the living. The dead take their secrets with them and the living are left to fret about what was and was not shared—a fresh set of secrets.
