The second time I was told I didn't look sick was ten months later. The cause of the infection continued to elude the top doctors in Illinois, and I was left with no viable treatment options. For a while, I'd been seeing a therapist, who specialized in health issues, to help me cope with the crippling anxiety of being undiagnosed.

It is my hope that next time you see someone who looks healthy, you stop before you judge. Maybe they 'look fine' but parked in a handicapped spot. Maybe they 'sound fine' but called in sick to work. Remember this letter and think about Annie's experience. You don't have to completely understand what someone is going through to be kind.

I think we associate cancer with being thin, bald, etc. so when somebody looks 'normal', it makes a person think they're not sick. There are many sick people who don't look sick. Just look at someone getting out in a handicap parking space. Unless they crawl into the store, you don't know what's wrong with them.

Sometimes when people say you don't look sick they are actually trying to pay you a compliment. They are trying to tell you that the effort you put into your appearance has really paid off. You are looking good. They may also be using it as a coping mechanism so that the better you look the better you are from a cancer perspective.
